

08 Dec 2006

For the Medhospital Foundation, 2006 was a year of reflection and evaluation. Last few years we have seen an unprecedented accumulation of health and medicine related information on the web. Even we were overwhelmed by how digital information technology has restructured the way information is communicated. This proliferating wealth of knowledge and information has created an even bigger gap between the 'good and well represented information' and the 'unreliable and biased viewpoints'. These warrant a radical change in organizational functioning. Realizing that such a change is central to a better informed society, a lot of other individuals and organizations have found new interests in these areas and are doing commendable work on these fronts.

We as information providers are faced with a big and difficult challenge too: a challenge of reinventing ways of training our readers and reformatting the way we provide information. It was therefore time for us to evaluate our strategies even before we actually managed to assess what we had started. No matter how trying this year was for us, we never saw a wavering support or cooperation from our visitors or the Medhospital team. To me as the founder member, it was of immense pleasure to be part of such an organization and see it grow steadily year after year.

Today Medhospital Foundation has become an intricate part of our lives and lives of many of our visitors. Medhospital is about life and living. I feel proud to welcome you to the work of Medhospital Foundation.

Warmest regards
